Information Sources for Public Health, Health Care Administration, Finance, and More

The Library has access to a number of e-journal databases that are useful for identifying and retrieving information on healthcare administration, business and finance, statistics, data analytics, human resources, and other topics that are not strictly biomedical.

For example, you can do a combined search of EBSCO's Academic Search Complete and Business Source Complete databases. To do this, choose Academic Search Complete from the databases that are linked from the Library's PubMed and Other Databases page (<https://www.uthct.edu/for-health-professionals/library/databases>, linked from the right side of any Library web page), and add Business Source Complete or other EBSCO databases by clicking Choose Databases above the search box.

We also have EBSCO's version of the AGRICOLA database produced by the National Agricultural Library. It indexes articles on rural health, pesticide exposure, and other ag-related topics.

Finally, EBSCO offers its own version of the MEDLINE database, which is the major database covered by PubMed. EBSCO MEDLINE can be added to a combined search to help eliminate duplication that might result from doing a separate PubMed search. However, PubMed contains many more direct links to full text than are available in EBSCO MEDLINE.

Contact the Library for instruction and assistance on any of these databases.

Disaster Stories

The Library has a number of books that describe environmental disasters, occupational health events, and health injustices. Books in this category include:
